HISTORIC AMARILLO BUILDING celebrates its 100th anniversary this year, marking a century as one of downtown Amarillo's most iconic landmarks. Its first tower opened on New Year's Eve 1925 as the city's first skyscraper, the twin-tower building at 301 S. Polk St. drew roughly 5,000 guests to its grand opening — about one in three Amarillo residents at the time. The second tower opened in 1926. It was developed by Ross D. Rogers and Ernest O. Thompson, both future Amarillo mayors, alongside ten other local investors who believed in the city's future. Designed by the Kansas City firm Shepard & Wiser, the building's twin-tower courtyard layout delivered natural light to every office, including interior suites — a design decades ahead of its time. Financed largely through oil, gas, and cattle profits, the project delivered 100,000 square feet of Class A office space, unprecedented for 1920's Amarillo. It sparked the design of our downtown skyline, and the building earned a place on the National Register
